OLD GLIMPSES OF BURMAH.

The earliest notices of Burmah connect it with cold. It was the Chryse Regio, the Golden Chersonese, the Suvarna Bhumi, or "Golden Land." But it was probably never a land where gold was found in any great quantities. Gold is certainly present there, as in most other coun tries, but not in any abundance that might lead us to suppose that Burmah was once an Ophir or a California. It is much more likely that such names were given to Burmah because of the love of the Burmese for gilding, for gilded buildings and gilded ships were likely to strike the eye of a stranger and fire his imagination. In Marco Polo's travels the first mention of Burmah in the mediaval language of Europe to be found. He calls the kingdom Mien, Chinese fashion; and after narrating his opproach to it by a downhill journey of two and ahalf days, and a much longer passage through a wild country, he pauses to tell of a great battle which had taken place between the forces of the "Great Kaan" of Tartary and the King of Mien, which he describes so graphically that it at least for a long time.
